THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA, Plaintiff and Respondent, v. JOHN R FONTENOT, Defendant and Petitioner.	No. S _____ Court of Appeal No. B271368 (Los Angeles County Superior Court No. NA093411)
--	---

TO THE HONORABLE TANI CANTIL-SAKAUYE, CHIEF JUSTICE, AND TO THE HONORABLE ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT

ISSUE PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

Does this court's holding in People v. Martinez (1999) 20 Cal.4th 225 that attempted kidnapping is a lesser included offense of kidnapping remain good law in light of this court's more recent holdings in People v. Bailey (2012) 54 Cal.4th 740 and People v. Robinson (2016) 63 Cal.4th 200?

NECESSITY FOR GRANTING REVIEW

Review is necessary to secure uniformity of decision. The Courts of Appeal disagree regarding the continuing validity of certain older decisions of this court, which held that attempts of particular crimes were lesser included offenses of the completed crimes. (See People v. Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th 225 [attempted kidnapping] and People v. Kelly (1992) 1 Cal.4th 495 [rape].)

Division One of the First District Court of Appeal held that Kelly's conclusion that attempted rape was lesser included offense of rape was no longer controlling on light of this court's decision in Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th 740. (People v. Braslaw (2015) 233 Cal.App. 4th 1239, 1248-1252; see Exh. A, at pp. 11-13.) Analyzed under the tests set out in Bailey, attempted rape could not be justified as a lesser included offense. (Braslaw, supra, at p. 1252.)

Here, in contrast to Braslaw, Division Seven of the Second District Court of Appeal held that Martinez continued to control. Attempted kidnapping would remain a lesser included offense of kidnapping, regardless of Bailey, until this court directed otherwise. Although the court of appeal could not reconcile Martinez and Bailey, the court held that "as an intermediate appellate court, we 'must accept the law declared by courts of superior jurisdiction. It is not [our] function to attempt to overrule decisions of a higher court.'" (Exh. A, at p. 15, citing Auto Equity Sales, Inc. v. Superior Court (1962) 57 Cal.2d 450, 455.)

The court of appeal, however, noted "the apparent confusion in the intermediate appellate courts following Bailey," and the court "respectfully suggest[ed] the Supreme Court provide further guidance with regard to the issues surrounding attempted kidnapping." (Exh. A, at p. 16, fn. 5.)

STATEMENT OF THE CASE AND FACTS

Fontenot accepts the Court of Appeal's procedural and factual summaries, found at pages 2 through 5 of the slip opinion (Exh. A hereto) as may be supplemented by factual information set forth in the following arguments.

ARGUMENT

I. Review is Necessary to Secure Uniformity of Decisions Regarding Whether Certain Attempts are Lesser Included Offenses of Completed Crimes.

At oral argument in this case, neither respondent nor the Court of Appeal were able to explain how attempted kidnapping satisfied the necessary tests to be a lesser included offense of kidnapping. (See Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 748.) Both the court and respondent, however, cited Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th 225, as binding authority that required the Court of Appeal to hold that attempted kidnapping was nonetheless a lesser included offense.

Unsurprisingly, the Court of Appeal's slip opinion does not explain how attempted kidnapping meets the necessary tests, pointing out that this court's "rationale in Bailey appears to undermine its conclusion in Martinez that attempted kidnapping is a lesser included offense of kidnapping." (Exh. A, at p. 15.) The Court of Appeal noted in its slip opinion that Bailey specifically addressed Martinez and Kelly but chose not to overrule those precedents:

Given that Bailey treated the Martinez analysis as inapplicable to the situation before it, and the complexities inherent in the law of attempt (see Bailey, supra, 54 Cal. 4th at p. 753 ["[t]he law of "attempt" is complex and . . . not always clear . . . how to apply"], we decline to disregard Martinez's express finding that attempted kidnapping qualifies as a "lesser included offense" of kidnapping. (Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 241.)

(Exh. A, at p. 15.) Thus, the Court of Appeal held that, per Martinez, and until this court explicitly overruled Martinez, attempted kidnapping remained a lesser included offense of kidnapping in the courts of this state.

Although Bailey did not overrule Martinez or Kelly, what this court said was that although Martinez and Kelly “have stated or applied the general principle that attempt is a lesser included offense of any completed crime, it is not applicable here, where the attempted offense includes a particularized intent that goes beyond what is required by the completed offense.” (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 753.) Bailey did not address whether attempted rape (Kelly) or attempted kidnapping (Martinez) included such a particularized intent that went beyond what was required by a completed kidnapping or a completed rape.

To secure uniformity of decision, review is necessary to decide the question left undecided in Bailey—do Kelly and Martinez remain good law? Do the crimes of attempted rape and kidnapping include a particularized intent that goes beyond what is necessary for the completed crimes?

A. Convicting a Defendant of an Uncharged Crime Violates the Fifth And Sixth Amendments Unless The Uncharged Crime is a Necessarily Included Offense of a Charged Crime.

“It is ancient doctrine of both the common law and of our Constitution that a defendant cannot be held to answer a charge not contained in the indictment brought against him.” (Schmuck v. United States (1989) 489 U.S. 705, 717.) This stricture is based on due process principles of notice and a defendant’s right to present evidence at trial. (Id. at p. 718; see U.S. Const., 5th and 6th Amends.) If a prosecutor could ask for a verdict on an offense whose elements were not charged, the defendant’s “right to notice would be placed in jeopardy.” (Id. at p. 718.) Thus, a defendant may not be convicted of an uncharged offense unless the uncharged offense was necessarily included, and “To be necessarily included in the greater offense the lesser must be such that it is impossible to commit the greater without first having committed the lesser.” (Schmuck v. United States, supra, 489 U.S. at p. 719.)

These principles derive from the common law:

At common law the jury was permitted to find the defendant guilty of any lesser offense necessarily included in the offense charged. This rule originally developed as an aid to the prosecution in cases in which the proof failed to establish some element of the crime charged.

(Beck v. Ala. (1980) 447 U.S. 625, 633.)

Because of these due process principles, “a court lacks jurisdiction to convict a defendant of an offense that is neither charged in the accusatory pleading nor necessarily included in the crime alleged.” (In re Fernando C. (2014) 227 Cal.App.4th 499, 502–503.)

B. The Trial Court Added the Charge of Attempted Kidnapping Only after Both Parties Presented their Evidence and Argued their Cases.

In Fontenot’s case, only one crime was charged and tried: kidnapping. (1CT 21, 68; 1RT 10, 90.) The court, however, found Fontenot guilty of the uncharged crime of attempted kidnapping. (1RT 101.)

After a court trial, the trial court found that the prosecution had failed to prove a kidnapping: Fontenot had been prevented from moving M beyond the small lobby area “Isn’t that the classic attempt? Aren’t we talking about a classic attempt in this situation?” (1RT 98.) The trial court found the following:

I feel there was definitely a crime but I don’t believe it was a completed kidnapping. I think it was an attempt and, of course, it goes from an attempt, all of a sudden becomes a specific intent crime, which I find was there and I'm going to find the defendant not guilty of kidnapping but guilty of the attempt kidnapping.

The following day, Fontenot's counsel filed a brief arguing that attempted kidnapping was not a necessarily included offense of kidnapping and that the court could not lawfully convict Fontenot of the uncharged attempt. (SCT 1-3.)

The trial court disagreed. (1RT 108.) Citing People v. Crary (1968) 265 Cal.App.2d 534, the court stated "I think that resolves the issue." (1RT 108.) Defense counsel argued that more recent precedents made it plain that attempted kidnapping was not a necessarily included offense because it required the additional element of specific intent, and thus, the court could not lawfully convict Fontenot of the uncharged attempt. (1RT 109.) The court denied defense counsel's motion.

(1RT 110.)

C. Convicting Fontenot of the Uncharged Crime of Attempted Kidnapping Violated the Notice and Trial Guarantees of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments Because Attempted Kidnapping is Not a Lesser Included Offense of Kidnapping.

This court has:

applied two tests in determining whether an uncharged offense is necessarily included within a charged offense: the "elements" test and the "accusatory pleading" test. [Citation.] The elements test is satisfied if the statutory elements of the greater offense include all of the statutory elements of the lesser offense, such that all legal elements of the lesser offense are also elements of the greater. [Citation.] In other words, "[I]f a crime cannot be committed without also necessarily committing a lesser offense, the latter is a lesser included offense within the former.” [Citations.] Under the accusatory pleading test, a lesser offense is included within the greater charged offense if the facts actually alleged in the accusatory pleading include all of the elements of the lesser offense.

(Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 748.) Attempted kidnapping does not meet either of these tests. Moreover, a charge of attempted kidnapping makes additional defenses available to the defendant that are not available against a charge of kidnapping.¹ (See Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1249-1250; Exh. A, at p. 14.)

1. Attempted Kidnapping Is Not a Necessarily Included Offense of Kidnapping.

There are two tests for determining whether an uncharged offense is necessarily included within a charged offense: “the ‘elements’ test and the ‘accusatory pleading’ test.” (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 748.)

Examining the question in light of Schmuck v. United States, supra, 489 U.S. 705, People v. Robinson, supra, 63 Cal.4th 200, and People v. Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th 740, and applying the necessary tests, it is plain that attempted kidnapping is not a necessarily included offense of kidnapping.

In the simplest terms, attempted kidnapping fails the elements test because kidnapping requires only general intent, and attempted kidnapping requires specific intent. (See People v. Hamernik (2016) 1 Cal.App 5th 412, 420.) According to this court, the elements test is satisfied if the statutory elements of the greater offense include all of the statutory elements of the lesser offense, such that all legal elements of the lesser offense are also elements of the greater. In other words,

“[I]f a crime cannot be committed without also necessarily committing a lesser offense, the latter is a lesser included offense within the former.”

(Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 748, quoting People v. Reed (2006) 38 Cal.4th 1224, 1227.)

Here, the statutory elements of kidnapping do not include all of the statutory elements of attempted kidnapping: an attempted kidnapping requires specific intent, and kidnapping does not. “Because the act constituting a criminal attempt ‘need not be the last proximate or ultimate step toward commission of the substantive crime,’ criminal attempt has always required ‘a specific intent to commit the crime.’” (People v. Chance (2008) 44 Cal.4th 1164, 1170, quoting People v. Kipp (1998) 18 Cal.4th 349, 376.) Kidnapping, by contrast, is a “general intent crime” that contains no statutory element requiring proof of specific intent. (People v. Bell (2009) 179 Cal.App.4th 428, 435, fn. 2.) Kidnapping requires proof of just three elements: “(1) a person was unlawfully moved by the use of physical force or fear; (2) the movement was without the person’s consent; and (3) the movement of the person was for a substantial distance.” (Id. at p. 435; see also People v. Rountree (2013) 56 Cal.4th 823 853; People v. Castañeda (2011) 51 Cal.4th 1292, 1319; Pen. Code, § 207.) Attempted kidnapping requires an additional element, specific intent, and:

When a specific intent is an element of the offense it presents a question of fact which must be proved like any other fact in the case. It is nonetheless a question of fact though it cannot be proved by direct and positive evidence. All the circumstances surrounding the act furnish the evidence from which the presence or absence of the specific intent may be inferred by the jury; and no presumption of law can ever arise that will decide it.

(People v. Cole (1985) 165 Cal.App.3d 41, 48.)

Likewise, attempted kidnapping does not satisfy the accusatory pleadings test because the pleadings did not provide constitutionally adequate notice or opportunity to defend insofar as the information charged the crime using the statutory definition of the charged offense, kidnapping, without referring to the particular facts of the offense. (See People v. Robinson, supra, 63 Cal.4th at p. 207.)

Here, the information charged

On or about September 15, 2002, in the County of Los Angeles, the crime of KIDNAPPING-PC208(B)-SPEC ALLEG-VICT UNDER 14, in violation of PENAL CODE SECTION 207(a), a Felony, was committed by JOHN REYNOLD FONTENOT, who did unlawfully, forcibly, and by instilling fear, steal, take hold, detain and arrest MADELINE C. in LOS ANGELES County, California, and did take the said MADELINE C. into another country, state, county and another part of LOS ANGELES County.

(1CT 21.)

The statute reads:

Every person who forcibly, or by any other means of instilling fear, steals or takes, or holds, detains, or arrests any person in this state, and carries the person into another country, state, or county, or into another part of the same county, is guilty of kidnapping.

(Pen. Code, § 207, subd. (a).)

Plainly, the accusatory pleading merely repeated the statutory language. It did not allege facts that could have been sufficient to provide Fontenot with constitutionally adequate notice that he would be called to defend against a charge of attempted kidnapping.

2. There are Defenses to Attempted Kidnapping that Do Not Apply to a Kidnapping.

Attempted kidnapping is a specific intent crime. (People v. Cole, supra, 165 Cal.App.3d 41, 47-48) Kidnapping is a “general intent crime.” (People v. Bell, supra, 179 Cal.App.4th 428, 435.)

Specific intent crimes provide defenses that are not available to general intent crimes. (See Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at pp. 1249-1250.) For example, “As a specific intent crime, attempted rape of an intoxicated person hinges on a defendant’s actual intent and, thus, is subject to a good faith, unreasonable mistake-of-fact defense.” (Ibid.) “Actual rape of an intoxicated person, however, is a general intent crime, and, thus, is subject to a mistake-of-fact defense only if the mistake was objectively reasonable.” (Id. at p. 1250.) In addition to a good faith, mistake-of-fact defense, “Intoxication can negate the required mental state of a specific intent crime” (Ibid.)

3. The Different Proof Requirements for Attempted Versus Actual Kidnapping Mattered in the Present Case.

Fontenot’s case illustrates the important differences in proving an attempted versus a completed kidnapping. At Fontenot’s trial on the kidnapping charge, the only real issue was whether, by carrying M as far as the lobby door, Fontenot had carried M a substantial distance.² (1RT 91, 93-94, 98.) The only relevant facts were that Fontenot carried her as far as the door and got so far as placing his hand on the door handle. (1RT 23-24.) The prosecutor had to prove precisely how far Fontenot had carried away the victim and argue any differences in character between the starting and ending places of that movement.

² Fontenot testified that he had not seen, touched, approached, or spoken to M that night, but the closing arguments showed this theory was not being contested. (1RT 74-75.)

The parties then argued whether the prosecution had proved the movement was sufficiently substantial to support a kidnapping conviction.

Because he was charged only with kidnapping, Fontenot's intent in opening the door and what he intended to do if he succeeded in opening the door were not relevant. If he had only intended to take M outside to the street, his specific intent may not have supported a conviction for attempted kidnapping. (Cf. People v. Sheldon (1989) 48 Cal.3d 935, 952 [moving victim from a garage, to hallway in the house, to the kitchen, and then to the den insufficient]; People v. Green (1980) 27 Cal.3d 1, 65, 67 [moving victim 90 feet insufficient]; People v. Brown (1974) 11 Cal.3d 784, 788-789 [moving victim 75 feet insufficient]; People v. Thornton (1974) 11 Cal.3d 738, 767 [moving victim from front to back of laundromat insufficient]; People v. Daly (1992) 8 Cal.App.4th 47, 56 [moving victim 40 feet insufficient]; People v. John (1983) 149 Cal. App. 3d 798, 804-810 [moving victim 465 feet asportation insufficient].)

The critical point is that the kidnapping charge did not give Fontenot notice that his specific intent was a necessary element that the prosecution needed to prove. The information did not give him notice that he would need to defend himself against an inference that he intended to carry M away a substantial distance. (See People v. Fields (1976) 56 Cal.App.3d 954, 957.) Lacking notice of this element, he did not receive the trial and the notice the Fifth and Sixth Amendments guaranteed.

For these same reasons, this court recently determined that misdemeanor sexual battery (Pen. Code, § 243.4, subd. (e)(1)) was not a necessarily included offense of sexual battery by misrepresentation of professional purpose (Pen. Code, § 243.4, subd. (c)). (People v. Robinson, supra, 63 Cal.4th 200.) Sexual battery by misrepresentation of professional purpose prohibited touching an intimate part of another person for a sexual purpose when “the victim is at the time unconscious of the nature of the act because the perpetrator fraudulently represented that the touching served a professional purpose.” (People v. Robinson, supra, 63 Cal.4th at p. 204.)

The court’s summarized its reasoning:

It is true that every defendant who commits sexual battery by misrepresentation of professional purpose also commits misdemeanor sexual battery: The victim has been touched for a sexual purpose without consenting. However, the victim’s lack of consent arises from a particular circumstance created by the defendant’s misrepresentation. If the evidence does not support that circumstance, the misdemeanor offense cannot stand on the same factual foundation. Here, the evidence failed to show that two of the victims’ consent was negated by misrepresentation. That evidence was equally insufficient to establish lack of consent for purposes of misdemeanor sexual battery. Lack of consent may be shown in other ways to prove the misdemeanor offense, but the jury did not consider alternate grounds. Moreover, a charge of sexual battery under section 243.4(c) does not notify the defendant of the need to contest the consent issue on any basis other than the alleged fraudulent representation. Accordingly, misdemeanor sexual battery cannot be deemed a lesser included offense of sexual battery by misrepresentation of professional purpose.

(People v. Robinson, supra, 63 Cal.4th at pp. 204-205, bold added.) In short, misdemeanor sexual battery was not a necessarily included offense because that offense presented new and different questions of fact: 1) of which the defendant did not have notice, and 2) concerning which, the defendant had not had the opportunity to present evidence.

So too with the crimes of kidnapping and attempted kidnapping. Attempted kidnapping presents a new, additional question of fact: did the defendant specifically intend to move the victim a substantial distance? Because a kidnapping charge does not put the defendant on notice of this question, during a trial for kidnapping the defendant does not have the opportunity to present evidence on this question.

Thus, it would be unconstitutional, after such a trial where this question was not in dispute, to convict a defendant of attempted kidnapping after he has been charged only with kidnapping. To do so would violate the Sixth Amendment guarantee that “the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation.” (U.S. Const., 6th Amend.) It also violates the Fifth Amendment guarantee that “No person shall be ... deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” (U.S. Const. 5th Amend.)

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, Fontenot asks that this court grant review and accept the Court of Appeal’s respectful suggestion that this court “provide further guidance with regard to the issues surrounding attempted kidnapping.” (Exh. A, at p. 16, fn. 5.)

v.

JOHN FONTENOT,

Defendant and Appellant.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Superior Court of Los Angeles County, Gary Ferrari, Judge. Affirmed.

Michael Allen, under appointment by the Court of Appeal, for Defendant and Appellant.

Xavier Becerra, Attorney General, Gerald A. Engler, Chief Assistant Attorney General, Lance E. Winters, Senior Assistant Attorney General, Susan Sullivan Pithey, Supervising Deputy Attorney General and Robert M. Snider, Deputy Attorney General, for Plaintiff and Respondent.

Appellant John Fontenot was charged with one count of simple kidnapping. (See Pen. Code, § 207.) At a bench trial, the court found Fontenot not guilty of kidnapping, but guilty of attempted kidnapping.

Fontenot argues the court lacked jurisdiction to convict him of attempted kidnapping because that offense was neither charged in the accusatory pleading, nor necessarily included in the alleged crime of kidnapping. Although Fontenot acknowledges the California Supreme Court has previously held that attempted kidnapping is a lesser included offense of kidnapping (see People v. Martinez (1999) 20 Cal.4th 225, 241 (Martinez)), he contends that decision is no longer valid in light of the Court's subsequent decision in People v. Bailey (2012) 54 Cal.4th 740 (Bailey). We affirm, concluding we are bound by the Court's holding in Martinez.

FACTUAL BACKGROUND

A. Summary of Facts Preceding Trial

On March 23, 2016, the District Attorney for the County of Los Angeles charged defendant John Fontenot with one count of kidnapping. (Pen. Code, § 207, subd. (a).)¹ The information further alleged that the victim of the kidnapping was under 14 years of age. (§ 208, subd. (b).)²

² The information also included numerous special allegations regarding prior offenses, asserting that Fontenot had suffered three prior strike convictions within the meaning of the California Three Strikes Law (§§ 667.5 and 1170.12), three prior

At a bench trial, Destiny L. testified that on the night of September 15, 2012, she was babysitting a four-year-old child named Madeline in the lobby of an apartment building. Madeline was “playing dolls” with two other girls her age. Sometime between 9:00 and 10:00 p.m., Destiny heard the lobby door open, and saw Fontenot enter the building. He was barefoot, wearing only underwear and a shirt. Destiny had previously seen Fontenot washing himself with a hose located in front of the building.

Fontenot approached the three girls, and told Madeline to “come here.” He then grabbed Madeline’s arm, and pulled her across the lobby, toward the exit of the building. As Fontenot was pushing open the exit door, Destiny grabbed Madeline’s other arm, and told the other two girls to run. Destiny then kicked Fontenot, causing him to reach toward his leg, and release Madeline. Destiny picked up Madeline, and brought her to the family’s apartment.

A police officer involved in the investigation testified that he arrived at the family’s apartment approximately one hour after the incident, and saw Madeline wrapped in a blanket, crying. The officer stated that the child looked scared and “visibly shaken.”

Fontenot testified in his defense. He denied entering the building, and denied touching the child. He admitted he had used drugs in the past, but asserted that he had not used drugs on the date of the incident.

At closing argument, the district attorney argued that the evidence established Fontenot had used force to move Madeline prison term felonies (§ 667.5, subd. (b)) and three prior serious felonies (§ 667, subd. (a)).

without her consent, and that the only “issue” for the court to decide was whether Madeline had been moved for a “substantial distance.” The district attorney asserted that Destiny’s testimony showed Fontenot had pulled Madeline across a fifteen-foot wide apartment lobby, and had moved the child in a manner that increased her risk of harm.

In response, defense counsel argued that while there was sufficient evidence to support a finding that Fontenot had attempted to kidnap Madeline, the evidence was not sufficient to convict him of kidnapping: “The only issue is was this a kidnapping or attempted kidnapping. . . . [¶] . . . [¶] You have an attempt. And I’ll submit it to the court. I think the evidence is sufficient to show an attempt. It is not sufficient for actual kidnapping. There is no substantial movement.”

The court agreed with defense counsel, explaining that Fontenot’s actions constituted a “classic attempt” because he had only moved the victim a “short distance” before Destiny intervened. After hearing further argument, the court announced its verdict: “I feel there was definitely a crime but I don’t believe it was a completed kidnapping. I think it was an attempt, and, of course, it goes from an attempt, all of a sudden becomes a specific intent crime, which I find was there, and I’m going to find the defendant not guilty of the kidnapping but guilty of the attempted kidnapping.”

The next day, defense counsel submitted a letter brief arguing that the court lacked jurisdiction to convict Fontenot of attempted kidnapping because: (1) the district attorney had not charged Fontenot with attempt; and (2) attempted kidnapping is a specific intent crime, and therefore does not qualify as a lesser included offense of kidnapping, a general intent crime. Although defense counsel acknowledged the evidence “might support [an attempt] conviction,” she argued the court had no authority to “make a finding as to an uncharged offense.” After hearing oral argument on the issue, the trial court ruled that attempted kidnapping was necessarily included within the charged offense of kidnapping. The court also found that Fontenot’s conviction qualified as a third strike offense, and that he had suffered three prior serious felony convictions and three prior prison term felonies.

The court sentenced Fontenot to an aggregate term of 40 years to life in prison, which consisted of 25 years to life in prison for the attempted kidnapping, plus three consecutive five-year terms for the three prior serious felonies.

DISCUSSION

Fontenot argues the trial court had no authority to convict him of attempted kidnapping because that offense was not charged in the accusatory pleading, and is not a lesser included offense of kidnapping. Although Fontenot acknowledges that our Supreme Court has previously found attempted kidnapping to be a lesser included offense of kidnapping (see Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th 225), he asserts the Court effectively overruled that holding in Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th 740.

A. Summary of Relevant Law

“When a defendant pleads not guilty, the court lacks jurisdiction to convict him of an offense that is neither charged nor necessarily included in the alleged crime. [Citations.] This reasoning rests upon a constitutional basis: “Due process of law requires that an accused be advised of the charges against him in order that he may have a reasonable opportunity to prepare and present his defense and not be taken by surprise by evidence offered at his trial.” [Citation.]’ [Citations.]” (People v. Lohbauer (1981) 29 Cal.3d 364, 368-369; see also In re Fernando C. (2014) 227 Cal.App.4th 499, 502-503 [“Due process of law requires that an accused be advised of the charges against him; accordingly, a court lacks jurisdiction to convict a defendant of an offense that is neither charged in the accusatory pleading nor necessarily included in the crime alleged”].)

Simple kidnapping is “a ‘general intent crime’” (People v. Bell (2009) 179 Cal.App.4th 428, 435 (Bell); see also People v. Davis (1995) 10 Cal.4th 463, 519) that requires the prosecution to “prove three elements: (1) a person was unlawfully moved by the use of physical force or fear; (2) the movement was without the person’s consent; and (3) the movement of the person was for a substantial distance.’ [Citation.] This last element, i.e., that the victim be moved a substantial distance, is called the ‘asportation’ element.” (Bell, supra, 179 Cal.App.4th at p. 435.) Attempted kidnapping, in contrast, is a specific intent crime that has two elements: a specific intent to commit kidnapping, and a direct but ineffectual act done toward its commission. (See § 21a; People v. Clark (2011) 52 Cal.4th 856, 948 [attempt to commit a crime consists of two elements: a specific intent to commit the crime, and a direct but ineffectual act done toward its commission]; People v. Cole (1985) 165 Cal.App.3d 41, 47-48 [attempted kidnapping is a specific intent crime].)

In Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th 225, the defendant was charged with simple kidnapping (§ 207, subd. (a)). The evidence at trial showed the defendant had moved the victim 40 or 50 feet from a residence before responding officers intervened. The jury found the defendant guilty of kidnapping.

The Supreme Court granted review to clarify “the asportation requirement [for] simple kidnapping, and articulate what factors are appropriate to making that determination.” (Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 229.) The Court explained that its prior decisions had held “distance [was] . . . the sole criterion for assessing asportation” in simple kidnapping cases. (Id. at p. 234.) After reviewing the language and history of section 207, the Court overruled those prior decisions, holding that the jury could properly consider factors other than distance, including “whether that movement increased the risk of harm above that which existed prior to the asportation, decreased the likelihood of detection, and increased both the danger inherent in a victim’s foreseeable attempts to escape and the attacker’s enhanced opportunity to commit additional crimes.” (Id. at p. 237.) The Court also concluded, however, that this multi-factor asportation standard could not be applied retroactively to the defendant, and that there was insufficient evidence to sustain his kidnapping conviction under the previously-applicable, distance-based standard.

The Court further found that because there was insufficient evidence to sustain the defendant’s kidnapping conviction, the proper remedy was to modify the judgment to attempted kidnapping: “Although we must reverse the kidnapping count, [Penal Code] section 1181, subdivision 6,³] authorizes us to reduce the conviction to the lesser included offense of attempted kidnapping . . . in light of the record.” (Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 241.) The Court explained that the evidence at trial conclusively established that “but for the prompt response of the police, the movement would have exceeded the minimum asportation distance set by [prior cases].” (Ibid.)

³ Section 1181, subdivision 6 states: “When the verdict or finding is contrary to law or evidence, but if the evidence shows the defendant to be not guilty of the degree of the crime of which he was convicted, but guilty of a lesser degree thereof, or of a

Two years later, in People v. Kelly (1992) 1 Cal.4th 495 (Kelly), the Court imposed a similar remedy after having reversed a rape conviction. The defendant in Kelly was charged with rape and several other offenses. The evidence at trial raised a factual issue as to whether the victim had died before the sexual assault occurred. The trial court instructed the jury that “[i]t is legally possible to rape a dead body.” (Id. at p. 526.) The Supreme Court found this instruction was erroneous, and that the error required a reversal of the defendant’s rape conviction. The Court further concluded, however, that “the error would not . . . have affected a conviction of the lesser included offense of attempted rape,” and modified the judgment of conviction to attempted rape. (Id. at p. 528.)

In Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th 740, the defendant was charged with “‘escape from custody,’ in violation of Penal Code section 4530, subdivision (b).” (Id. at p. 745.) The evidence at trial showed the defendant was found “in an area where inmates were not permitted without authorization.” (Id. at p. 744.) During a subsequent investigation, prison officials determined the defendant had reached the location by sawing through the lesser crime included therein, the court may modify the verdict, finding or judgment accordingly without granting or ordering a new trial, and this power shall extend to any court to which the cause may be appealed.”

bars of his cell window, and breaching several security fences. The defendant was interrogated, and admitted he was trying to escape the prison facility. At trial, however, the defendant denied that he had been trying to escape, asserting he had cut through several layers of prison security to attack another inmate, against whom he held a grudge. The jury was instructed that to constitute an escape, it was not necessary for the defendant to have left the outer limit of the prison facility. Instead, the defendant need only have passed beyond a barrier intended to keep the prisoner within a designated area. The jury found defendant guilty of escape.

The appellate court reversed based on instructional error, concluding that the crime of escape requires an inmate to have moved beyond the outer boundary of the prison facility. The court further held that while there was sufficient evidence to support a finding of attempted escape, it had no authority to modify the judgment to that lesser offense because “attempt to escape contains an element of specific intent to escape that escape does not.” (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 747.) Thus, “attempted escape is not a lesser included offense of escape.” (Ibid.)

The Supreme Court “granted review solely on the modification issue.” (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 747.) In its analysis, the Court explained that under “section[] 1181, subdivision 6, . . . an appellate court that finds that insufficient evidence supports the conviction for a greater offense may, in lieu of granting a new trial, modify the judgment of conviction to reflect a conviction for a lesser included offense.” (Id. at p. 748.) The Court further explained that “two tests [apply] in determining whether an uncharged offense is necessarily included within a charged offense: the ‘elements’ test and the ‘accusatory pleading’ test. [Citation.] The elements test is satisfied if the statutory elements of the greater offense include all of the statutory elements of the lesser offense, such that all legal elements of the lesser offense are also elements of the greater. [Citation.] In other words, “[I]f a crime cannot be committed without also necessarily committing a lesser offense, the latter is a lesser included offense within the former.” [Citations.] Under the accusatory pleading test, a lesser offense is included within the greater charged offense if the facts actually alleged in the accusatory pleading include all of the elements of the lesser offense. [Citations.]” (Id. at p. 748.)

After concluding that the accusatory pleading test was inapplicable, the Court analyzed whether attempted escape was a lesser included offense of escape under the elements test. The Court explained that escape is a “general intent crime” that is “‘completed when the prisoner wilfully leaves the prison camp, without authorization. . . .’ [Citations.] The only requisite for its commission is that the defendant intentionally do the act which constitutes the crime.’ [Citation.] Thus, for instance, evidence that a defendant was voluntarily intoxicated or intended to return when he left is generally immaterial to the commission of escape.” (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 749.) Attempt to escape, in contrast, “requires a specific intent to escape. . . . Thus, ‘[i]t is not possible to attempt to escape without intending to escape.’ [Citation.]” (Ibid.) The Court held that because attempted escape “requires additional proof that the prisoner actually intended to escape,” it does not qualify as a “lesser included offense of escape.” (Ibid.)

In its analysis, the Court considered and rejected the Attorney General's assertion that "attempt is [always] a lesser included offense of any completed crime." (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 747.) In support of this argument, the Attorney General had cited language from prior Supreme Court decisions stating that a crime cannot be "committed in the absence of an attempt to commit it," and "point[ed] to" Martinez and Kelly as examples of cases in which the Court had previously "reduced a general intent offense to an attempt to commit that offense." (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 747.) The Court, however, concluded those prior cases were not controlling, explaining: "[T]he law of 'attempt' is complex and fraught with intricacies and doctrinal divergences. [Citation.] 'As simple as it is to state the terminology for the law of attempt, it is not always clear in practice how to apply it.' [Citation.] Thus, '[w]e must not generalize in the law of attempt.' [Citation.] Although the . . . cases relied on by the Attorney General have stated or applied the general principle that attempt is a lesser included offense of any completed crime, it is not applicable here, where the attempted offense includes a particularized intent that goes beyond what is required by the completed offense." (Id. at p. 753.)

In People v. Braslaw (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 1239, the defendant was convicted of raping an intoxicated person. On appeal, he argued the trial court was obligated to instruct the jury on attempted rape of an intoxicated person, "contending the crime is a lesser included offense of rape of an intoxicated person." (Id. at p. 1247.) In assessing this claim, the court explained that under Bailey, "[a]ttempts are only lesser included offenses if the sole distinction between the attempt and the completed offense is completion of the act constituting the crime. [Citation.] If the attempt requires a heightened mental state, as is the case with attempts of many general intent crimes, the attempt requires proof of an additional element and is therefore not a lesser included offense.” (Id. at p. 1248.)

The court then analyzed the elements of the crimes at issue, explaining that “[a]ctual rape of an intoxicated person is a general intent crime” (Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at p. 1250), while attempted rape of an intoxicated person requires specific intent to commit the crime. (Id. at p. 1249.) The court also highlighted certain consequences that result from those differing mental states. First, the court explained that “[a]s a specific intent crime, attempted rape of an intoxicated person hinges on a defendant’s actual intent and, thus, is subject to a good faith, unreasonable mistake of fact defense.” (Id. at p. 1249.) For the general intent crime of rape of an intoxicated person, however, mistake of fact is available as a defense only “if the mistake was objectively reasonable.” (Id. at p. 1250.) Second, the court explained that while “[i]ntoxication can negate the required mental state of a specific intent crime, such as attempted rape of an intoxicated person,” intoxication cannot negate the “general intent . . . mental state required for actual rape of an intoxicated person.” (Ibid.) According to the court, given “the significantly different intent requirements” between the two offenses, “attempted rape of an intoxicated person is not a lesser included offense of rape of an intoxicated person.” (Id. at p. 1252.)

The court also addressed the Supreme Court’s prior decision in Kelly, which had reversed a rape conviction, and modified the judgment to “the lesser included offense of attempted rape.” (Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at p. 1251 [citing and quoting Kelly].) The court concluded Bailey, rather than Kelly was controlling, explaining: “Kelly significantly predate[s] Bailey, and [did not] appl[y] the elements test set forth in that case. In fact, . . . Kelly [did not] engage[] in any analysis to establish that attempted rape is a lesser included offense of forcible rape. Furthermore, the Supreme Court, in other, more recent cases, has recognized that rape and attempted rape require different kinds of intent. [Citations.] [¶] . . . [¶] We therefore conclude Bailey is controlling and compels the conclusion attempted rape of an intoxicated person is not a lesser included offense of rape of an intoxicated person.” (Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at p. 1252.)⁴

B. We Are Compelled to Follow Martinez

Although Fontenot acknowledges Martinez “treated attempted kidnapping as a lesser included offense of kidnapping”, he argues that Bailey effectively overruled that portion of Martinez, clarifying that when an attempted crime contains a specific intent element that is not required to complete the offense, the attempt is not a lesser included offense of the completed crime. Fontenot further asserts that applying Bailey’s framework here, attempted kidnapping, a specific intent crime, is not a lesser included offense of kidnapping, a general intent crime.

⁴ See also People v. Hamernick (2016) 1 Cal.App.5th 412 [applying Bailey and concluding that attempted possession of a controlled substance is not a lesser included offense of possession.]

We agree that the analysis in Bailey suggests that if an attempt requires a heightened mental state that is not required to prove the completed crime, it does not qualify as a lesser included offense. (See Braslaw, supra, 233 Cal.App.4th at p. 1248; People v. Ngo (2014) 225 Cal.App.4th 126, 156 [under Bailey, “when the completed offense is a general intent crime, an attempt to commit that offense does not meet the definition of a lesser included offense under the elements test because the attempted offense includes a specific intent element not included in the complete offense”]; People v. Mendoza (2015) 240 Cal.App.4th 72, 83 (Mendoza.) Moreover, as Fontenot correctly notes, our courts have previously held that kidnapping is a general intent offense (Davis, supra, 10 Cal.4th at p. 519; Bell, supra, 179 Cal.App.4th at p. 435), and that attempted kidnapping is a specific intent offense. (Cole, supra, 165 Cal.App.3d 41, 47-48 [attempted kidnapping requires specific intent].) Thus, as discussed in Braslaw, certain defenses that negate specific intent, including voluntary intoxication and unreasonable mistake of fact, would presumably be available as defenses against attempted kidnapping, but not available against a charge of kidnapping. (See People v. Atkins (2001) 25 Cal.4th 76, 81-82 [evidence of intoxication is generally “inadmissible to negate the existence of general criminal intent,” but admissible “to negate the existence a specific intent”]; People v. Givan (2015) 233 Cal.App.4th 335, 350 [“for a general intent crime any mistake of fact must be both reasonable and actual before it is presented to the jury. [Citation.] In contrast, an unreasonable mistake of fact may be asserted in a specific intent crime . . . so long as the defendant had an actual mistaken belief”]; see also Mendoza, supra, 240 Cal.App.4th. at p. 83.)

The Court's rationale in Bailey appears to undermine its conclusion in Martinez that attempted kidnapping is a lesser included offense of kidnapping. However as an intermediate appellate court, we "must accept the law declared by courts of superior jurisdiction. It is not [our] function to attempt to overrule decisions of a higher court." (Auto Equity Sales, Inc. v. Superior Court (1962) 57 Cal.2d 450, 455 (Auto Equity).

Martinez is a directly controlling case, and expressly states that attempted kidnapping is a lesser included offense of kidnapping. That language cannot be deemed dicta because the Court did in fact reduce the defendant's conviction to attempted kidnapping, an offense that was neither charged in the information nor pursued by the prosecution at trial. Moreover, Bailey specifically cites Martinez as an example of a case in which the Court had previously found it proper to "reduce a general intent offense to an attempt to commit that offense." (Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 753.) Bailey does not contain any language directly questioning Martinez's continued validity in kidnapping cases. Instead, Bailey explained that "[t]he law of "attempt" is . . . fraught with intricacies and doctrinal divergences." (Ibid.)

Given that Bailey treated the Martinez analysis as inapplicable to the situation before it, and the complexities inherent in the law of attempt (see Bailey, supra, 54 Cal.4th at p. 753 ["[t]he law of "attempt" is complex and . . . ' . . . not always clear . . . how to apply"], we decline to disregard Martinez's express finding that attempted kidnapping qualifies as a "lesser included offense" of kidnapping. (Martinez, supra, 20 Cal.4th at p. 241.) We recognize that other courts have, as discussed above, applied the Bailey analysis to crimes other than kidnapping, where there was no other binding Supreme Court precedent. Here, however, there is direct authority.⁵ Unless and until the Court reverses Martinez, we are bound by that holding. (See Auto Equity, supra, 57 Cal.2d at p. 455 [“Under the doctrine of stare decisis, all tribunals exercising inferior jurisdiction are required to follow decisions of courts exercising superior jurisdiction. . . . The decisions of [the California Supreme Court] are binding upon and must be followed by all the state courts of California. . . .”].)

DISPOSITION

The judgment is affirmed.
